Customer Reviews

I read Kilborn's novel "Origin" and thought it was somewhat fun -- Satan is locked in a top-secret military research facility and hijinx ensue. I thought I'd give the author another shot. That turned out to be a big mistake. Haunted House features approximately 12 protagonists, all of whom are survivors from Kilborn's other novels. Some of them are maimed and one has a memorable verbal tic. Apart from that, they're virtually indistinguishable. I found myself confusing the prostitute with the legless athlete, and the men -- well, one of them was a cop. There were just too many characters to keep straight. For fans of Kilborn's other novels this might feel like an awesome homecoming. To me it felt like a party where I knew no one. Now, the plot: the dozen-odd protagonists are each offered $1 million to spend the night in a famously haunted house. Most of them go. Hijinx ensue... and that's the plot in a nutshell. I won't spoil it for you even though it's tempting. Here are some of the odd things in the story:- The haunted house is famously haunted -- like, it's killed multiple people. Think Amityville Horror only real. If such a place existed in the real world it would be CRAWLING with scientists, or at least ghost-hunters. After the fourth or fifth death, the heirs of the deceased would own the haunted house and would start selling tickets and become millionaires. There's just no way a legitimately haunted house would sit idle.- Remember how I complained that there are too many protagonists to keep straight? Well, the same's true with the ghosts. There are five or six specifically different ghosts: one with a bullwhip, one that burned to death, one that giggles and self-mutilates with a cleaver, one with four arms. You get the idea.
